BRENT

Special to the Journal.

Brent, July 1.—The rainy season has reached us at last. On the first days of the week the threatening rain clouds would approach so close that we could almost touch them with the longer end of a thirty-cent fishing pole, but we could only get about 6 average drops to the square acre. Wednesday we had invidious showers sufficient to dampen the outside of a farmer's calico shirt. On Thursday the precipitation was more copious, reminding us that the rainy season is near at hand.

Sweet potato planting is now resumed and the agricultural situation is more hopeful again.

Prof. Allen is slowly regaining his exhausted strength. Recuperation is tedious in the advanced years of our lives.

If the decision should be made to terminate all lives at the age of 60—when our usefulness is estimated to cease—it will stir up the blood of retired sages, and precipitate a revolutionary war between the ages.

The Jim Crow law is now in full bloom, and I predict that it will spread into other states as its beauties become apparent.
